Abstract

The rationale of this thesis is to provide a thorough understanding of spalling for semiconductor materials and develop a low temperature spalling technology that reduces the surface roughness of the spalled wafers for Photovoltaics applications. The results in this work indicate a promising path towards finely controlling the surface roughness during spalling for applications such as wafering of a block or lift-off devices from a semiconductor substrate.